Directly appealing then to His disciples He showed them that their true attitude toward a sinning man should be that of rebuking him, and if he repented, that he should be forgiven. This is where the rulers were failing. If they had seen things as they really were, that the savelie we remark them. When that is so, we shall ever be watchful that we put no stumbling-block in the way of the lost ones, and that we allow ourselves to entertain no unforgiving spirit toward those who have been guarding our actions toward them, and inspiring our service on their behalf, is never the outcome of observing them, save where such observation is illuminated by that faith in them which is the outcome of actual fellowship with the could be that of rebuking him, and if he repented, that he should be forgiven.

This is were the truers were failing. If they had seen things as they really were. This is where the rulers were failing. If they had seen things as they really were, they would have discovered in the eagerness of publicans and sinners to hear Jesus, at least a movement toward the high moral standards which He was erecting, and would have been ready to forgive.

The lesson also emphasizes the fact that the service we render Him He has a right to expect, and we must render it for His sake, and not from selfish motives, even though they are of the highest nature.
